On the one hand, it is argued (particularly in France) that competition law is a threat to the values of public services that underlie their distinctive objectives. On the other, the 'Anglo-Saxon' argument is that protecting public services from competition gives them an unfairly protected position and can mask their inefficiencies.

The issues that the chapters in this book raise suggest a broader set of limits, some intrinsic to antitrust, others extrinsic. Our starting point was the intrinsic limits of competition law that Judge Frank Easterbrook highlighted in his seminal article The Limits of Antitrust. We consider, however, that Judge Easterbrook's points related to his concern about overenforcement of antitrust law and the risks raised by the specificity of the U.S. enforcement system, which...
